One widely seen type of pathological reaction can be classified as "Posttraumatic Embitterment Disorder (PTED)." Like PTSD, this disorder is characterized not by a particular type of stressful events, but by a distinct psychological process (experiences of injustice and violation of basic beliefs) and by a highly specific psychopathological profile (embitterment and intrusions).

Posttraumatic Embitterment Disorder: Definition, Evidence ...

This differentiates posttraumatic embitterment disorder from posttraumatic stress disorder, because the event is not life threatening or fear provoking. The authors review the empirical evidence they have gathered in the book's second section, which includes diagnostic interviews and criteria, self-rating scales, and epidemiology.

However, in 2003 German psychiatrist Michael Linden proposed an idea called Post-Traumatic Embitterment Disorder (PTED for short). PTED is defined by the 'pathological reaction to a life event which, while traumatic, is one recognized within society'. This could be anything from the end of a relationship to losing a job. These resentments ...

What Is Post-Traumatic Embitterment Disorder?

4. Posttraumatic Embitterment Disorder (PTED) On the lines of PTSD, the construct has resulted in the development of a new concept called PTED where the core triggering emotion is EMB, whereas the core emotion in PTSD is anger. PTED is a pathological reaction to drastic life events and the trigger is an extraordinary though common
