~~The simple answer is yes, pilots do and are allowed to sleep during flight but there are strict rules controlling this practice. Pilot rest can be separated into two categories; ' Controlled Rest ' where the pilot sleeps whilst in the cockpit at the controls or ' Bunk Rest ' where sleep or rest is taken either in the passenger cabin (in a seat reserved for the pilots) or in the dedicated pilot bunks available on long haul aircraft.~~

On Virgin Australia's Airbus A330 200 jets, which don't have crew rest areas, "the pilots and crew occupy specific passenger seats for their rest. This is typical of this type of aircraft. Pilots use a business class seat at the back of the cabin, whilst cabin crew have a block of seats at the rear of the aircraft which are curtained off," Inall tells me.
